The CIA warns that British Islamist extremists are the greatest threat to US homeland security.

American spy chiefs have told the President that the CIA has launched a vast spying operation in the UK to prevent a repeat of the 9/11 attacks being launched from Britain. They believe that a British-born Pakistani extremist entering the US under the visa waiver programme is the most likely source of another terrorist spectacular on American soil. Intelligence briefings for Mr Obama have detailed a dramatic escalation in American espionage in Britain, where the CIA has recruited record numbers of informants in the Pakistani community to monitor the 2,000 terrorist suspects identified by MI5, the British security service.

A British intelligence source revealed that a staggering four out of 10 CIA operations designed to thwart direct attacks on the US are now conducted against targets in Britain. And a former CIA officer who has advised Mr Obama told The Sunday Telegraph that the CIA has stepped up its efforts in the last month after the Mumbai massacre laid bare the threat from Lashkar-e-Taiba, the militant group behind the attacks, which has an extensive web of supporters in the UK. The CIA has already spent 18 months developing a network of agents in Britain to combat al-Qaeda, unprecedented in size within the borders of such a close ally, according to intelligence sources in both London and Washington. Bruce Riedel, a former CIA officer who has advised Mr Obama, told The Sunday Telegraph: "The British Pakistani community is recognised as probably al-Qaeda's best mechanism for launching an attack against North America."

"The American security establishment believes that danger continues and there's very intimate cooperation between our security services to monitor that." Mr Riedel, who served three presidents as a Middle East expert on the White House National Security Council, added: "President Obama's national security team are well aware that this is a serious threat." The British official said: "The Americans run their own assets in the Pakistani community; they get their own intelligence. There's close cooperation with MI5 but they don't tell us the names of all their sources. "Around 40 per cent of CIA activity on homeland threats is now in the UK. This is quite unprecedented." Explaining the increase in CIA activity over the past month, Mr Riedel added: "In the aftermath of the Mumbai attack the US and the UK intelligence services now have to regard Lashkar-e-Taiba as just as serious a threat to both of our countries as al-Qaeda. They have a much more extensive base among Pakistani Diaspora communities in the UK than al-Qaeda."

Information gleaned by CIA spies in Britain has already helped thwart several terrorist attacks in the UK and was instrumental in locating Rashid Rauf, a British-born al-Qaeda operative implicated in a plot to explode airliners over the Atlantic, who was tracked down and killed in a US missile strike in November. But some US intelligence officers are irritated that valuable manpower and resources have been diverted to the UK. One former intelligence officer who does contract work for the CIA dismissed Britain as a "swamp" of jihadis. Jonathan Evans, the director general of MI5, admitted in January that the Security Service alone does not have the resources to maintain surveillance on all its targets. "We don't have anything approaching comprehensive coverage," he said.

The dramatic escalation in CIA activity in the UK followed the exposure in August 2006 of Operation Overt, the alleged airline bomb plot. The British intelligence official revealed that CIA chiefs sent more resources to the UK because they were not prepared to see American citizens die as a result of MI5's inability to keep tabs on all suspects, even though the Security Service successfully uncovered the plot. MI5 manpower will have doubled to 4,100 by 2011 but many in the US intelligence community do not think that is enough. For their part, some British officials are queasy that information obtained by the CIA from British Pakistanis was used to help target Mr Rauf, a British citizen, whom they would have preferred to capture and bring to trial.

Sensitivities over the intelligence arrangement formed a key part of briefings given to Mr Obama, since they are central to what is often called "the most special part of the special relationship" and could complicate his dealings with Gordon Brown. Tensions in transatlantic intelligence relations which were laid bare last week during the High Court battle over Binyam Mohamed, the British resident held in Guanatanamo Bay. British judges wanted to publish details of the torture administered to Mr Mohamed, an Ethiopian national, in US custody. But key paragraphs were blacked out after American officials threatened it could damage intelligence sharing between the two countries.

Intelligence experts said that a trusting intelligence relationship, in which one country does not publish intelligence data obtained by the other, is vital to both countries' national security. Patrick Mercer, chairman of the House of Commons counter-terrorism sub-committee, said: "The special relationship is a huge benefit to us. It clearly works to our advantage and helps keep the people of the UK and the US safe. "There is no doubt that a great deal of valuable intelligence vital to British national security is procured by American agents from British sources." Mr Riedel added: "The partnership between the two intelligence communities is dynamic; it is one of great intimacy. We overuse the term special relationship, but this is an extraordinarily special relationship. "Since September 11 the philosophy on both sides has been to err on the side of telling each other more rather than less. It is in everyone's interests that that continues.
Another hint of things to come in the Age of Obama: Israel appears to be calling the shots more than ever. Shortly after the Vatican showed some independence and disapproval of Israel’s latest atrocities against civilians in Gaza, US law enforcement has suddenly decided to re-investigate the whole paedophile priest business.

While the Catholic church sex scandal was an incredible disgrace, it resulted entirely from liberal “new age” tolerance of allegedly non-sexually active Gays in the priesthood. A large percentage of Gay men however are prolific paedophiles and a few Gay priests have victimized hundreds of innocent boys, cost the church hundreds of millions of dollars in lawsuits and severely damaged the reputation of the Church. While the paedophile priests and those who covered up for them deserve all the legal trouble in the world, it’s curious that the US government has suddenly decided to bring up this issue after the recent Vatican-Israeli dispute.

The Wall Street Journal reports: “Federal authorities are investigating the Catholic Archdiocese of Los Angeles to see whether top church officials tried to cover up the sexual abuse of minors by priests…A federal grand jury has issued subpoenas and begun calling witnesses in the probe, which began late last year, said this person. The investigation is still in its early, fact-gathering stage, and it isn’t known whether any criminal charges will result.

J. Michael Hennigan, a lawyer for the archdiocese, said in an email on behalf of church officials: ‘The Archdiocese has received requests from the U.S. Attorney’s office for information about a number of individual priests, two of whom are deceased; none of whom remain in ministry. We have been and will continue to be fully cooperative with the investigation… Cardinal Roger Mahony, who heads the archdiocese, the largest in the U.S., has been criticized by victims’ groups for his past handling of sexual-abuse allegations against priests. The Los Angeles County District Attorney’s office has been investigating allegations of such abuses for several years. District Attorney Steve Cooley criticized the archdiocese in 2007 for its institutional moral failure to supervise predatory priests. A spokeswoman for the district attorney’s office said their investigation is still open.’”

Now, here’s the thing with this. Some years ago Cardinal Mahony paid out a stunning $660 million dollars—yes, you heard that right, $660 million—in a so-called “civil settlement,” most of which was of course sucked up by the attorneys for about 40 or so middle-aged men who were sexually molested by priests many years ago. The Catholic Church tried to deal with this mess by throwing money at it, like they were so many Democrats. That was probably a mistake; when lawyers smell money it’s like sharks smelling blood. While it’s true that molestations took place, virtually all of these cases were well beyond the statute of limitations. The only practical way to prevent molestations in the future is to ban Gays from seminaries and weed them out of the priesthood, and it’s not entirely clear anyone has bothered to do this. What’s the point of paying millions in fines if a new generation of boy-molesters is in seminary schools right this moment?

After years of non-stop coverage of the paedophile priest crisis by the Jewish media, there is a danger that some “new victims” may arise who are hoping to win a rich settlement, and what jury is going to believe a priest nowadays after decades of demonization? After the big payout several years ago the whole foul business dropped off the radar, as Cardinal Mahony had intended. But now all of a sudden it rises from the grave. Why? Let’s step back and look at the big picture. In an effort to heal a long-standing schism in the Church, Pope Benedict XVI has recently lifted the excommunication of the Pope Pius X society, a traditional or Tridentine Catholic group. This included lifting the excommunications of four bishops ordained by John Paul II’s conservative arch-rival Marcel Lefevre, including a British prelate named Roger Williamson who made the impolitic mistake of questioning the Holocaust in public and sticking up for the Palestinians of Gaza who have just been slaughtered in the thousands by Israeli artillery and missiles. Williamson did in fact make a grovelling apology for his Holocaust heresy as a condition for lifting the excommunication, but apparently that wasn’t enough. In response the Chief Rabbi of Israel officially severed religious relations with the Vatican. In a matter of days after the breaking off of Vatican-Jewish ties, there’s a grand jury in Los Angeles going after Cardinal Mahony himself this time. Mahoney may have to flee to the Vatican or hole up in a foreign embassy like Cardinal Mindsent of Hungary had to do for all those years to escape Stalin’s Communists. Actually, that’s not a bad comparison, in view of the nature of the regime now persecuting the Church sixty years later.
More Power Outages due to Government Incompetence.

White Americans are far too tolerant of government incompetence. And government incompetence appears to be growing by leaps and bounds. Two years ago the Pacific Northwest suffered a winter storm that knocked out power to hundreds of thousands—some for well over a week. Now a storm has hit the mid-West knocking out power to 1.3 million. It should not be that hard to keep the power on during a winter storm. All it takes is a little precautionary work cutting down trees that might fall over onto power lines BEFORE winter comes around. How hard is this to do? Are liberal politicians just not allocating the funds for (what should be) routine maintenance work like this, but instead spending the money on their pet projects?

A USA Today article reports “Utility crews made some progress Friday in restoring power to the more than 1.3 million homes and businesses darkened by an ice storm that crippled states from Missouri to West Virginia, but thousands were still bunking in toasty shelters because their homes had no water or heat. At Murray University in southwestern Kentucky, brothers Jim McClung, 42, and Dale Earnest, 38, were among those resting in every corner of a university theater. Some sprawled in aisles, propped in chairs or curled up on the stage. They, like many others, ran out of food and water at their frigid, powerless home. ‘I had no idea the storm was going to last this long,’ McClung said… Kentucky Gov. Steve Beshear, who toured some of the damage Thursday (said) ‘It’s going to take several days, if not weeks, to dig our way through all of this all across the state.’ For some, things were getting better. About 60,000 had power restored since Thursday, and with warmer temperatures predicted for the weekend, crews could make ‘substantial progress’ in the next few days, said Public Service Commission spokesman Andrew Melnykovich. Still, some 547,000 homes and businesses were still in the dark — including about 172,000 in Louisville.”

Remember that bridge in Minneapolis? If it had gotten routine painting and maintenance, it would be still standing today. Civil engineering structures are designed so that cracks will appear in the concrete before an ultimate failure. There were plenty of cracks in the Minneapolis bridge, but these were being ignored and the necessary repair work went undone. The article continues “Roads were still littered with ice-caked power lines, downed trees and other debris. Help from around the country was arriving in convoys to assist the states with the worst outages. At a mall turned into a staging area in Barboursville, W.Va., crews in hard hats met Thursday alongside piles of poles, generators, wire and other supplies to find out where to go first… Since the storm began Monday, the weather has been blamed for at least 38 deaths… Emergency officials feared that toll could rise if people stay in their homes without power for too long, because improper use of generators can cause carbon monoxide poisoning. In Kentucky, three of the deaths there were likely due to carbon monoxide poisoning, authorities said.” We desperately need a pro-White political party in America to start representing the interests of White people and to start demanding the competency in government that a First World industrialized nation should have. If this means we need to start mass-deporting Latinos, Hindus and Pakis to restore competency, then so be it.

In the meantime, White Americans need to plan for even more governmental incompetence. Some companies are producing generators that run off natural gas which automatically turn on when the electricity fails. People with homes without natural gas may want to install Franklin stoves. (Fireplaces are extremely inefficient at heating compared to Franklin stoves.) Many Americans have set up their own solar cells and storage batteries so they can disconnect from the electric company. As these winter power failures become more common, it may be a good idea to cut the line to the power company before it cuts itself. Try to rely on the government infrastructure as little as possible because we are quickly becoming a Third World nation.
Mr Brown said “British Jobs for British Workers. So what's happened.

British workers need protection from foreign labour, not Labour Party arrogance which tells them to leave this country, British National Party Nick Griffin has said. Reacting to the shocking display of anti-British sentiment expressed by Business Secretary “Lord‖ Mandelson, who said that the British workers who lost their jobs to foreign workers “should go and work elsewhere in Europe if they were unhappy.” Prime Minister Gordon Brown has condemned the growing wildcat strikes over the use of foreign workers in Britain as “indefensible.” He added that his infamous pledge of “British jobs for British Workers” only meant that “people would be given the skills to compete against other nationalities.” No more proof was needed of how institutionally anti-British the Labour Party has become, Mr Griffin said. “To think that a party which had its origins in the British workplace could have morphed into something which actually looks with disdain upon workers is an astonishing sight,” he said. “For Mr Mandelson to then claim that those who seek to protect British livelihoods are encouraging protectionism and are therefore causing more trouble, is a further indication of how out of touch he and his party have become.”

The BNP is proud, Mr Griffin continued, to be a protectionist party. “British workers need protecting from foreign labour, and British industry needs protecting from foreign imports. British jobs need protecting, and British families need feeding. “The country has been plunged into a full scale depression precisely because of globalisation and the government’s refusal to protect British interests. We say that protectionism is the only solution, and to this end we pledge ourselves. “Mr Brown, on the other hand, knows very well that the latest crisis is not caused by a lack of skills, as he tries to claim, but by the fact that companies are simply only offering jobs to foreign workers and specifically excluding British people.” Mr Griffin said it was also vital to remember that the ability of EU workers to take British jobs away was the direct result of the European Union, into which the Tories had dragged the country.

“Don’t let the lying Tories now try and pretend that they have nothing to do with this disaster. That party was the one who sold off the country’s national assets to their cronies in the name of privatisation, and who first took us into the EU. “Both Tory and Labour are a malaise on British society for which the only cure is the British National Party,” Mr Griffin concluded.

Please give generously and help the Waffen-SS Veterans.

Men who fought in the Waffen-SS do not receive any veterans’ benefits. HIAG (Hilfsgemeinschaft auf Gegenseitigkeit der Angehörigen der ehemaligen Waffen-SS) was an organization of Waffen-SS veterans that helped other Waffen-SS vets who were wounded or handicapped and were having trouble making ends meet in their golden years. At its height in the 1960s around 70,000 of the approximately 250,000 former Waffen-SS members living in West Germany were members of HIAG. HIAG disbanded in 1996. We are trying to fill the gap HIAG left behind by helping a group of former HIAG Veterans in Munich. As one HIAG member said, "We are still gute Kameraden and one stays for the other; that's what TREUE means." These are men of true valor, Honor and loyalty.
British Nurse Suspended for offering to pray for an ill patient.

In Britain’s allegedly multicultural society, there is one religious group which is apparently not to be afforded equal respect, let alone treated for what it embodies - the foundational creed of this nation. That group is Britain’s Christians. Suspended: Caroline Petrie offered to pray to help a patient recover.

Somerset community nurse and committed Christian Caroline Petrie has been suspended and faces being sacked and even struck off for offering to say a prayer for an elderly patient. Although startled, the patient - herself a Christian - did not make a complaint and was in no way offended.

Nevertheless Mrs Petrie’s boss wrote to her saying she was required to uphold the reputation of her profession - which apparently means demonstrating ‘a personal and professional commitment to equality and diversity’ and not using her professional status ‘to promote causes that are not related to health’.

Apparently, Mrs Petrie previously received a warning about promoting her faith at work after she offered to give a prayer card to an elderly male patient. Now there may be a valid point here about professionalism. Offering prayer cards comes close to touting one’s faith, which might well be thought inappropriate on the wards. But even so, one would have thought that a quiet word in the nurse’s ear would have been all that was necessary. Instead, Mrs Petrie was packed off to an ‘equality’ course for some diversity training.

This Orwellian response has now been followed up by the draconian action of suspending her with the possibility of outright dismissal from her job simply because she offered to pray for another patient.
Alfred Jodl

Born 10th May 1890
In Würzburg

Died 16th October 1946
In Nuremberg

A True German War Hero and a True National Socialist.

Chef des Wehrmachtsführungsstabes Alfred Jodl joined the German armed forces as an artillery Officer and served his country during the first world war. He served on the eastern front and the western front and was twice wounded. In 1917 he was made a staff officer and sent to the western front. After the war he remained in the Reichwehr.

During the second world war Jodl was Chief of Operations Staff and contributed greatly to the early battles in Norway and Denmark. This was a man of great skill and a true dedicated soldier to National Socialist Germany.

In May 1945 Jodl was forces to sign the instrument of unconditional surrender, He was then put on trail at Nuremberg for, so called, war crimes and was found guilty. The allies lied accusing him of many war crimes of which he had done none. He had served his country well and honourably. Was this just vindictiveness on behalf of the allies? I think we know the answer to that.

Alfred Jodl had an interesting life and led and interesting life in interesting times. We shall always remember this Hero and the evil that was done to him.
How many honest people does Obama know?

Many Americans were surprised to see Timothy Geithner approved to be Secretary of the Treasury despite the little matter of him not paying taxes. Just a few days later two more Obama nominees were found to have failed to pay taxes and were forced to drop out. Millions of Obama worshipers seem to think some new age of enlightenment and ethics has come to Washington, D.C. In reality, we are likely to see even more corruption than the disgraceful Clinton regime. The first hints should have been Obama’s origins from the incredibly corrupt Chicago political machine. Obama’s good friend, Tony Rezko, who helped his early career and who helped him get his mansion, is currently in jail on corruption charges. Now, in less than two weeks, Obama has managed to nominate three -count ‘em- THREE people to high positions in his administration who didn’t bother to pay their taxes.

The financial Post reports “Timothy Geithner won confirmation as U.S. Treasury secretary on Monday as the U.S. Senate set aside misgivings about his past income tax problems in light of his experience battling the financial crisis. Mr. Geithner, 47, was sworn in as U.S. Treasury secretary on Monday a little more than an hour after the Senate approved him… some lawmakers were disturbed enough by the tax lapse to vote against Mr. Geithner…” An article reports “Barack Obama’s choice to head U.S. healthcare reform withdrew in a flap over personal taxes on Tuesday, prompting the president to admit ‘I screwed up’ and distracting from his drive for a nearly $900 billion economic stimulus plan. Tom Daschle, a former Senate Democratic leader and key Obama adviser who was named as health secretary, withdrew after a storm over late tax payments raised questions about Obama’s pledge to bring high ethical standards to the White House. Daschle said he did not want to become a ‘distraction’ after paying $140,000 in back taxes for failing to report as income the use of a company car and driver for several years… Daschle’s withdrawal came shortly after Obama’s nominee to become the first U.S. ‘chief performance officer’ also dropped out on Tuesday because of tax questions. Nancy Killefer, Obama’s choice to oversee budget and spending reform, said she did not want her problems to create ‘distraction and delay.’ ”

And we all know that Hillary Clinton is Obama’s Secretary of State. Years ago, Hillary profited from a windfall profit involving Cattle Futures – in what was believed to be a disguised bribe in the form of “stock parking.” Hillary was also a senior member of the Rose Law Firm. A large percentage of that law firm went to prison. Hillary and her husband were partners with the MacDougals in the Whitewater land development company. Both Susie and Jim MacDougal went to prison. Jim MacDougal was denied heart medication and died in prison. Instead of believing Barack Obama will be some sort of “Magic Negro,” perhaps Americans should take a good hard look at the typical African government and the level of corruption that is typical there. Somehow, it seems like that will be a much more accurate way of predicting just how ethical Obama’s cabinet will be.

It’s good to have honest friends and good to know that we have such good people looking after our interests?
