NJ lawmaker resigns amid child porn investigation

A New Jersey legislator resigned Monday amid reports that he's under investigation for suspected possession of child pornography. The clerk of the Assembly received a one-sentence letter from Assemblyman Neil Cohen just before 9:30 a.m. Monday. Cohen said his resignation is effective immediately, but he did not offer any explanation. Cohen has not been charged with a crime. Colleagues who use the same legislative district office as the 57-year-old Democratic lawmaker said last week that they told law enforcement authorities about images of child pornography found on his computer.

State Assemblyman Joseph Cryan, who shared a district office with Cohen, said the investigation began after a staffer in the Union Township office found a printout of a nude girl, possibly in her early teens or younger. Cryan and State Sen. Raymond Lesniak said they referred the case to the state Attorney General's Office. Attorney general spokesman Peter Aseltine said the office does not comment on whether it is investigating cases.

Cohen, an unmarried divorce lawyer, has served in the Assembly in 1990-91 and continuously since 1994. Regarded as one of the most liberal legislators, Cohen is also considered one of the busiest, having introduced 342 bills this legislative session — 94 more than any other legislator.

"Assemblyman Cohen was a respected legislator who dedicated his life to the State House and whose legacy would have been great," said Assembly Speaker Joseph J. Roberts. "Unfortunately, all of that will now be forever overshadowed."

"We sincerely hope he receives the help he desperately needs," Roberts said. Gov. Jon S. Corzine issued a statement Monday calling the allegations "deeply disturbing." "All of us who have worked with him are shocked by the reports," Corzine said. "Child pornography reflects a horrible debasement of children that is totally intolerable. Creating, distributing and using child pornography should be pursued vigorously by law enforcement wherever it is found." Cryan said Cohen remained hospitalized for psychiatric treatment on Monday. Cohen did not return a call to his cell phone Monday morning.
White Vietnam Veteran killed by black in South Seattle.

After surviving a tour in Vietnam, James Paroline was murdered in front of his house in Ranier Beach as a hot-headed young Black man punched him in the head, knocking him to the ground, where he fractured his skull. Paroline died one day later. The incident started over a dispute between Paroline and some Black women, who objected to him putting out road cones to protect a garden hose he was using to water a traffic circle in front of his home.

A recent new article reports “60-year old James Paroline was beaten into critical condition by a passing motorist after he obstructed traffic in order to water the flowers on a traffic circle. Paroline was confronted by a car full of women who tried to move the cones he had used to keep drivers from driving over his garden hose. After squirting one of the girls with his hose, a 5′10″ African-American male apparently exited his vehicle and hit Paroline once, so hard that Paroline was unconscious and bleeding on the pavement.” Normal people would just drive around the road cones, but apparently the uppity Black women wanted to force the issue. If anyone actually objected to the road cones (and were not just trying to pick a fight), they could have easily called the police, who would have told Paroline not to put them out on the road. The exact details of the dispute remain unclear since Paroline is dead and unable to tell his side of the story. Apparently a young Black man in a second car ran out and punched Paroline in the head causing him to fall and suffer fatal head injuries.

Most Americans are taught to respect the elderly, not to punch them in the head as hard as they can. One wonders if the young Black involved hated White people and was looking for any excuse to beat one up, especially an old frail White man. Of course the Seattle authorities will never investigate this as a hate crime even though there’s a strong chance it was. No description of the assailant or mug shot drawing has been released possibly for fear of inflaming racial tensions. No doubt the Seattle authorities wish to sweep this under the rug, even if it means the murderer continues to run loose in society.

Mr. Paroline’s biggest mistake was living near the large sprawling Black population in southeast Seattle. He may have been one of many pensioners, who didn’t want to move from his life-long home. The trouble is that nothing good comes from living near Blacks. Thefts, burglaries, muggings and rapes are always common in mixed-race areas. In West Seattle, a young Black male, who hated White people, shot a White commuter dead for no reason. The murder of James Paroline is yet another senseless Black crime that will leave Paroline’s family in mourning because a young Black thug could not keep his temper in check and violently assaulted an old White man.

Liberal Whites endlessly praise “Diversity” and try to tell us that “we’re all alike.” Well, I’ve never heard of a White person killing someone over watering some plants. The truth is that many Blacks are extremely hot-heated and violent. The only way this White man would have been safe would have been to move away from the high crime area of South Seattle or to have been carrying a gun so he could have shot the Black male aggressor before he was beaten to death. If you see Blacks routinely driving through past your home, then you’re living in a neighborhood like the one that cost Mr. Paroline his life. We would like to pass on our condolences to Mr. Paroline’s family.
Canadian settlement builders sued

Palestinian villagers are suing two Canadian construction companies over their involvement in building a Jewish settlement in the occupied West Bank.

The case, filed at a court in Montreal, accuses the firms of violating international and Canadian law. The Palestinians are seeking a court order to halt building work. The lawyer for the villagers says this is the first case in which a foreign private sector company has been sued for investing in West Bank settlements.

The two companies, both registered in the province of Quebec, could not be reached for comment.

'Blinking red light'

The Palestinian villagers accuse the companies of violating international and Canadian law by building on land belonging to the village of Bilin, and selling the homes to Israelis. The building work is taking place on land seized from Bilin after Israel captured the West Bank in 1967, according to the legal papers. The villagers argue that the construction work violates international war crimes laws that forbid an occupying power from transferring its own people into occupied land.

The villagers want the court to order the demolition of all the homes that the companies have built. They are also seeking punitive damages of nearly $2m (£1m). "My understanding is that it will serve as a blinking red light for any investors and corporations that are considering doing anything in the settlements," said Michael Sfard, the villagers' lawyer.

Bilin has been the scene of ongoing protests over the controversial barrier built by Israel in the West Bank, which cuts Bilin from most of its agricultural land. In September, the Israeli Supreme Court ordered the government to redraw its route near Bilin, accepting an appeal by residents. The decision has yet to be enforced.

Another Success.

Marching forward with the NSM in OMAHA.

Congratulation to NSM Iowa and to all members and supporters who attended.

Grave Robbing Makes a Comeback

Two hundred years ago, gangs of ghouls called “Resurrection Men” crept through the foggy night in Britain and in America, stealthily unearthing the coffins of the newly buried dead and stealing their bodies for sale to medical schools and doctors who needed specimens for medical experimentation. Mary Shelley’s novel Frankenstein” was written at about the time when this practice became prevalent. The Frankenstein story had its “Igor” doing this.

Now, the Resurrection Men are back. According to a St. Louis Today article “Grave robbing has become an above-ground affair. Gone are the days when enterprising thieves would dig up an old grave and pillage for gold teeth and rings. Today, it’s mostly the bronze markers and flower vases that draw their attention. Rising scrap metal prices, coupled with the lagging economy, have triggered a string of cemetery thefts both locally and across the nation.”

The ghouls also target brass and copper fittings on caskets and funeral laying-out clothing, which is usually the deceased man’s best suit, although these being lazy Generation X thieves, they get these things by breaking into funeral homes at night, and not by good old-fashioned digging by the light of the moon.

The article continues “‘I can’t think of anything lower,’ said David Evans, general manager for Valhalla Gardens of Memory in Belleville. ‘Nothing’s worse than stealing from the dead.’ …But grave robbers beware: The authorities are getting wise. States are passing laws and police are cracking down. In March, the Madison County Sheriff’s Department arrested three people for stealing 40 vases from two Metro East cemeteries. The owner of a Granite City scrap recycling center turned them in. Late last year, a trio of thieves hit the Valhalla Memorial Park cemetery in East Alton. They stole 17 bronze vases from graves in the cemetery. A month later, they went back and stole a dozen more. The two men and a woman were arrested after a tipster reported a suspicious vehicle. Charges are pending… The scrap value of a bronze vase is about $10, according to cemetery operators; the replacement price often tops $300. Three men were arrested earlier this month on charges of stealing more than 1,000 brass vases and headstones from nine Chicago-area cemeteries. Also this month, about 150 bronze vases were reportedly stolen from a West Virginia cemetery. In addition, a man was arrested on charges of stealing 55 vases from grave sites in the Fort Myers, Fla. area. In the last few weeks, robberies have been reported at cemeteries in Arizona, Maryland, Michigan and North Carolina.”

As the American economy begins what may well be its final slide into the Second Great Depression, we’re going to see an increase in bizarre crimes of desperation like this. Stealing these bronze vases and copper fittings brings in such a relatively low profit compared to drug dealing or knocking over liquor stores that it’s entirely possible these thieves are simply trying to raise enough money to put gasoline in their tanks or some food on the table.
Did Jewish Owners Get Soft Treatment from ICE?

Remember that big kosher meat packing plant in Postville, Iowa, run by Hasidic Jews from New York. The one that was busted a couple of months ago for working hundreds of illegal aliens. Well, guess who gets to take the fall? Will it be the Jewish owners or some low-level Gentile scapegoats?

The New York Times reports: “Two supervisors at a kosher meatpacking plant in Iowa where hundreds of illegal immigrants were rounded up in May were arrested Thursday on criminal immigration charges. Federal prosecutors said they had also issued an arrest warrant for a third man described by workers as a plant manager… The supervisors, Juan Carlos Guerrero Espinoza and Martin De la Rosa Loera, were arrested at the Agriprocessors plant in Postville, prosecutors said. They were the first employees who were not rank-and-file workers to be arrested since 389 illegal immigrants were rounded up at the plant on May 12, said Bob Teig, a spokesman for the United States attorney for the Northern District of Iowa. Federal authorities called the raid the largest enforcement operation by immigration authorities at a single workplace. Unions and immigrant advocacy groups had criticized immigration officials for focusing arrests on workers while taking no action against top managers.”

The top managers were Hasidic Jews from New York. Hmm…could there possibly be a connection between that fact and their immunity from prosecution? Back to the Times: “The arrest warrant was issued for Hosam Amara, 43. In interviews after the raid, several workers said Mr. Amara was a floor manager with more authority than line supervisors. They said he was a link between workers on the slaughterhouse floors and meatpacking lines and more senior management. Agriprocessors, which before the raid was the country’s largest producer of kosher meat, is owned by Aaron Rubashkin. Two weeks after the raid, he removed his son Sholom as chief executive.” This is interesting. You don’t suppose someone secretly tipped off Mr. Rubashkin and then he hired a (probably Ethiopian) Hosam Amara to be the top guy at the plant on the day of the raid. Could people be capable of such underhanded scheming?

The Times article continues “Most of the illegal immigrants arrested at the plant were from rural Guatemala. In expedited proceedings, 270 workers were sent to federal prison on criminal charges, most for presenting false documents when they were hired. In a criminal complaint unsealed on Thursday, federal authorities said Mr. Guerrero was the supervisor of four departments in the Postville plant, including a slaughterhouse called Beef Kill. Workers cited anonymously in the complaint said Mr. Guerrero was running a business obtaining fraudulent immigration documents, known as green cards… In the days before the raid, the workers said, according to the complaint, Mr. Guerrero told them in a meeting that they needed new IDs and Social Security numbers to continue working at the company. Mr. Guerrero collected $200 and a photograph from each worker, promising to provide new documents, the complaint says.”

It sounds like they were trying to cover their tracks with phony documents, but the raid caught them just before fake documents could be produced. One wonders if ICE would have meekly accepted those documents from workers, who probably spoke little-to-no English.
We, The salt of the earth, take precedence.

Ed: A very interesting article, and worth reading, see how we have been fed lies.

Which country is the rogue nation? Iraq? Iran? Or the United States? Syndicated columnist Charley Reese asks this question in a recently published article. Reese notes that it is the U.S. that routinely commits “acts of aggression around the globe.” The U.S. government has no qualms about dropping bombs on civilians, whether they be in Serbia, the Middle East, or Africa. It is all in a good cause – our cause. This slaughtering of foreigners doesn’t seem to bother the American public. Americans take it for granted that Americans are superior and that American purposes, whatever they be, take precedence over the rights of other people to life and to a political existence independent of American hegemony.

The Bush regime has come up with a preemption doctrine that justifies attacking a country in order to prevent the country from possibly becoming a future threat to the U.S. “Threat” is broadly defined. It appears to mean the ability to withstand the imposition of U.S. hegemony. This insane doctrine justifies attacking China and Russia, a direction in which the Republican presidential candidate John McCain seems to lean. The callousness of Americans toward the lives of other peoples is stunning. How many Christian churches ask God’s forgiveness for having been rushed into an error that has killed, maimed, or displaced a quarter of the Iraqi population? How many Christian churches ask God to give better guidance to our government so that it does not repeat the error and crime by attacking Iran? The indifference of Americans to others flows from “American exceptionalism,” the belief that Americans are graced with a special mission to impose their virtue on the rest of the world. Like the French revolutionaries, Americans don’t seem to care how many people they kill in the process of spreading their exceptionalism. American exceptionalism has swelled Americans’ heads, filling them with hubris and self-righteousness and making Americans believe that they are the salt of the earth.

Three recent books are good antidotes for this unjustified self-esteem. One is Patrick J. Buchanan’s Churchill, Hitler, and the Unnecessary War. Another is After the Reich: The Brutal History of the Allied Occupation by Giles MacDonogh, and a third is John Pilger’s Freedom Next Time. Buchanan’s latest book is by far his best. It is spellbinding from his opening sentence: “All about us we can see clearly now that the West is passing away.” As the pages turn, the comfortable myths, produced by history written by the victors, are swept aside. The veil is lifted to reveal the true faces of British and American exceptionalism: stupidity and deceit. Buchanan’s strength is that he lets the story be told by Britain’s greatest 20th-century historians and the memoirs of the participants in the events that destroyed the West’s dominance and moral character. Buchanan’s contribution is to assemble the collective judgment of a hundred historians. As I read the tale, it is a story of hubris destroying judgment and substituting in its place blunder and miscalculation. Both world wars began when England, for no sound or sensible reason, declared war on Germany. Winston Churchill was a prime instigator of both wars. He seems to have been a person who needed a war stage in order to be a “great man.” The American President Woodrow Wilson shares responsibility with Britain and France for the Versailles Treaty, which dismembered Germany, stripping her of territory and putting millions of Germans under foreign rule, and imposed reparations that Britain’s greatest economist, John Maynard Keynes, correctly predicted to be unrealistic. All of this was done in violation of assurances given to Germany that there would be no reparations or boundary changes. Once Germany surrendered, the assurances were withdrawn, and a starvation blockade forced German submission to the new harsh terms.

Hitler’s program was to put Germany back together. He was succeeding without war until Churchill provoked Chamberlain into an insane act. Danzig was 95 percent German. It had been given to Poland by the Versailles Treaty. Hitler was negotiating its return and offered in exchange a guarantee of Poland’s frontiers. The Polish colonels, assessing the relative strengths of Poland and Germany, understood that a deal was better than a war. But suddenly, the British Prime Minister issued Poland a guarantee of its existing territory, including Danzig, whose inhabitants wished to return to Germany. Buchanan produces one historian after another to testify that British miscalculations and blunders, culminating in Chamberlain’s worthless and provocative “guarantee” to Poland, brought the West into a war that Hitler did not want, a war that destroyed the British Empire and left Britain a dependency of America, a war that delivered Poland, a chunk of Germany, all of Eastern Europe, and the Baltic states to Joseph Stalin, a war that left the Western allies with a 45-year cold war against the nuclear-armed Soviet Union. People resist the shattering of their illusions, and many are angry with Buchanan for assembling the facts of the case that distinguished historians have provided. Churchill admirers are outraged that their hero is revealed as the first war criminal of World War II. It was Churchill who initiated the policy of terror bombing civilians in noncombatant areas. Buchanan quotes B.H. Liddell Hart: “When Mr. Churchill came into power, one of the first decisions of his government was to extend bombing to the noncombatant area.”

In holding Churchill to account, Buchanan makes no apologies for Hitler, but the ease with which Churchill set aside moral considerations is discomforting. Buchanan documents that Churchill’s plan was to destroy 50 percent of German homes. Churchill also had plans for using chemical and biological warfare against German civilians. In 2001 the Glasgow Sunday Herald reported Churchill’s plan to drop 5 million anthrax cakes onto German pastures in order to poison the cattle and through them the people. Churchill instructed the RAF to consider drenching “the cities of the Ruhr and many other cities in Germany” with poison gas “in such a way that most of the population would be requiring constant medical attention.” “It is absurd to consider morality on this topic,” the great man declared.

Paul Johnson, a favorite historian of conservatives, notes that Churchill’s policy of terror bombing civilians was “approved in cabinet, endorsed by parliament and, so far as can be judged, enthusiastically backed by the bulk of the British people.” Thus, the terror bombing of civilians, which “marked a critical stage in the moral declension of humanity in our times,” fulfilled “all the conditions of the process of consent in a democracy under law.” British historian F.J.P. Veale concluded that Churchill’s policy of indiscriminate bombing of civilians caused an unprecedented “reversion to primary and total warfare” associated with “Sennacherib, Genghis Khan, and Tamerlane.” The Americans were quick to follow Churchill’s lead. Gen. Curtis LeMay boasted of his raid on Tokyo: “We scorched and boiled and baked to death more people in Tokyo that night of March 9-10 than went up in vapor in Hiroshima and Nagasaki combined.”

MacDonogh’s book, After the Reich, dispels the comfortable myth of generous allied treatment of defeated Germany. Having discarded all moral scruples, the allies fell upon the vanquished country with brutal occupation. Hundreds of thousands of women raped; hundreds of thousands of Germans died in deportations; a million German prisoners of war died in captivity. MacDonogh calculates that 2.5 million Germans died between the liberation of Vienna and the Berlin airlift. Nigel Jones writes in the conservative London Sunday Telegraph: “MacDonogh has told a very inconvenient truth,” a story long “cloaked in silence since telling it suited no one.”

The hypocrisy of the Nuremberg trials is that the victors were also guilty of crimes for which the vanquished were punished. The purpose of the trials was to demonize the defeated in order to divert attention from the allies’ own war crimes. The trials had little to do with justice. In Freedom Next Time, Pilger shows the complete self-absorption of American, British, and Israeli governments whose policies are unimpeded by any moral principle. Pilger documents the demise of the inhabitants of Diego Garcia. The Americans wanted Diego Garcia for an air base, so the British packed up the 2,000 residents, people with British passports under British protection, and deported them to Mauritius, one thousand miles away. To cover up its crime against humanity, the British Foreign and Commonwealth Office created the fiction that the inhabitants, whose families had been living in the archipelago for two or three centuries, were “a floating population.” This fiction, wrote a legal adviser, bolsters “our arguments that the territory has no indigenous or settled population.” Prime Minister Harold Wilson and Foreign Secretary Michael Stewart conspired to mislead the UN about the deported islanders by, in Stewart’s words, “presenting any move as a change of employment for contract workers – rather than as a population resettlement.”

Pilger interviewed some of the displaced persons, but emotional blocs will shield patriotic Americans and British from the uncomfortable facts. Rational skeptics can find a second documented account of the Anglo-American rape of Diego Garcia online. An entire people were swept away. Two thousand people were in the way of an American purpose – an air base – so we had our British dependency deport them. Several million Palestinians are in Israel’s way. Pilger’s documented account of Israel’s crushing of the Palestinians shows that our “democratic ally” in the Middle East is capable of any evil and has no remorse or mercy. Israel is an apt student of the British and American empires’ attitudes toward lesser beings. They simply don’t count.

Those who are the salt of the earth take precedence over everything.
Baby snatcher who steals babies straight out of her victims womb

One of the more bizarre criminal phenomena in Politically Correct society are the cases of female blacks who steal babies, often by cutting open the pregnant mothers often killing the victim in the process. There have been several cases of this African madness over the past few years, and we’ve apparently got another one of these on our hands now. In fact the woman in question has done this more than once. Interestingly, the story seems to have been completely missed by the American media (more PC censorship) and if it weren’t for the British Daily Mail it probably would have gotten only the barest minimum of local coverage.

The Daily Mail article reports a “Serial womb raider was under arrest after being suspected of cutting a newborn baby from a mother and claiming it was hers. Andrea Curry-Demus, 38, had tried to claim she had just given birth to the baby boy when she turned up at a US hospital… The baby’s umbilical cord was still attached and the newborn had not been cleaned up since the birth. But after tests quickly established Curry-Demus had not given birth she later claimed to have bought the baby for $500 from a friend.”

I suspect that the cops knew pretty much know the routine by now. The article notes “Neighbours of the Curry-Demus, who has a history of trying to steal babies, noticed a foul smell coming from her flat in Wilkinsburg, Pennsylvania. When police broke in they discovered the body of Kia Johnson. She had been, drugged, tied up and her uterus sliced open. Authorities said Johnson, who was almost at full term pregnancy, had been partially eviscerated with most of her organs removed. Her hands and feet had been bound with duct tape and there was evidence that she had been drugged before the horrific attack… Curry-Demus was charged with child endangerment and dealing in infant children after a brief court appearance. She is being held on £5,000 bond and is to undergo psychiatric tests. In the early 1990s, Curry-Demus pleaded guilty to charges relating to abducting a baby and stabbing a pregnant woman in a plot to steal her unborn child. Court records show that Curry-Demus became pregnant at 12 and miscarried four months later. She had a second miscarriage in 1990, when she was 21.”

What happened to the murder charge? That is an extremely low bail for a killer.

America is currently having an ill-advised political love affair with Barack Obama. Perhaps Americans wish that all blacks dressed nicely and behaved themselves as Barack does in public. Unfortunately the Republicans have hacked up the execrable John McCain, who was possibly the worst Republican in the primary race. The world of blacks is full of crime and corruption and the occasional horrific, unimaginable crime like the one just detailed. (How much longer are our leaders going to tolerate this barbaric style of life, Have they no shame? Ed)
